7. The Secretariat subsequently circulated for information an informal summary of the special high-level meeting of the Council with the Bretton Woods institutions (E/2000/79). The text read as follows:

Informal summary by the Secretariat

“I. Background

“1. The General Assembly, in annex I, paragraph 88 of its resolution 50/227 on revitalizing the United Nations in the economic and social fields, recommended that the Economic and Social Council schedule periodically a high-level special meeting at a time proximate to the semi-annual meetings of the Bretton Woods institutions. The Council subsequently held high-level special meetings with the Bretton Woods institutions in 1998 and 1999. In response to the 1999 high-level meeting, the General Assembly encouraged the deepening of the dialogue between the Economic and Social Council and the Bretton Woods institutions in order to promote the wide range of reforms needed in an international financial architecture that reflects the global interests of the international community, and recommended that their next high-level meeting give priority to the consideration of the modalities needed to achieve a strengthened and more stable international financial system responsive to the challenges of development, especially in the developing countries, and to the promotion of economic and social equity in the global economy (see General Assembly resolution 54/197).

“2. The third special high-level meeting of the Economic and Social Council with the Bretton Woods institutions was held on 18 April 2000. The meeting addressed the theme of strengthening international financial arrangements and eradicating poverty. The meeting brought together policy makers in the areas of development cooperation, foreign affairs and finance for a dialogue in the Council. Along the lines of the two previous meetings, the high-level meeting of the Council was in the form of a free-flowing dialogue between a panel composed of Tarrin Nimmanahaeminda, Minister of Finance of Thailand, Chairman of the Development Committee; Stanley Fischer, Acting Managing Director of IMF, who also reported on the outcome of a recent meeting of the International Monetary and Financial Committee; Germán Suárez, President of the Central Bank of Peru, Chairman of the Group of 24; and Ulrich Gygi, Secretary of State of Finance, representing Switzerland as the country chairing the Group of 10. The meeting was opened by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and chaired by the President of the Council.

“3. The present report provides a synopsis of that 18 April 2000 meeting, and summarizes the salient points and main aspects of the statements that were made and exchanges of views that took place at the meeting.

“4. It is hoped that this summary will deepen the understanding of the main issues related to the reform of the global financial system and development, in the broader context of the commitment to fighting poverty in developing countries.

“II. Opening statements

“President of the Economic and Social Council

“5. The President of the Economic and Social Council welcomed the participants and stressed that the presence of high-level policy makers — in charge of the economy and finance, development cooperation and foreign affairs — indicated a strong and broadly shared desire to work together to achieve common goals. Such goals could only be realized if they inspired action and implementation, and if they actually worked together in mutual partnership.

“6. At the start of the twenty-first century, the world economy was dominated by globalization and interdependence. The lessons of Seattle pointed to the need for increased inclusion. Thus, the need for international cooperation had rarely been greater.

“7. The war on poverty was not being won. Nor was inequality being conquered. Rather, more countries than ever were being excluded from the onrush of the new global economy. Yet, globalization was here to stay and it was a common duty to ensure that it became a positive force for the poor everywhere.

“8. The General Assembly had invited those present in the high-level meeting to explore ways to strengthen and make more stable the international financial system, and to be more responsive to the challenges of development and to the promotion of economic and social equity in the global economy. Inclusion, participation and a greater share in the global decision-making process was a great challenge facing the international community in the twenty-first century.

“9. There was much hope in the forthcoming high-level event on financing for development that the General Assembly was preparing to convene in 2001. The event was expected to address a broad range of issues related to the financial architecture, sustained financial flows for development, a comprehensive debt strategy and a focus on poverty eradication. The full participation in the event by all Governments was important as well as the active support of the Bretton Woods institutions.

“10. A stable international financial system responsive to development was a key part of a global partnership to eradicate poverty. Poverty eradication was taking centre-stage of agreed agendas worldwide. The approaches of the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions to eradicate poverty were increasingly in unison.

“11. The impending debate in the high-level meeting showed the important role that the United Nations and the Economic and Social Council had to play in promoting dialogue and discussion in forging a consensus on world economic and social issues.

“Secretary-General

“12. The Secretary-General of the United Nations welcomed the colleagues from the Bretton Woods institutions. He said it had never been clearer that the peoples and nations of the world and the institutions created to serve them were engaged in a common mission. The chance of achieving shared objectives would be much greater if there was close cooperation among these institutions.

“13. In an age when globalization and new technology were bringing unimaginable benefits to one part of humankind, by most reckonings, the larger part remained excluded from those benefits, subjected to a life of grinding poverty. There was a recognition not only of the duty to change this state of affairs but also a shared interest in doing so.

“14. In his report entitled “We the peoples: the role of the United Nations in the twenty-first century” (A/54/2000) (Millennium Report), he had proposed reducing by half, before the year 2015, the proportion of people in the world living on $1 a day or less. That was an optimistic objective since in sub-Saharan Africa it could be achieved only with an economic growth rate far above any that the region had managed to date.

“15. Policies leading to sustained growth were critical. All the evidence showed a strong correlation between economic growth and the incomes of the poor. Policies should strive to encourage private investment; create job opportunities; harness the power of new information technologies; and improve the effectiveness and transparency of Governments themselves. There must be steps to end the war. There was nothing more inimical to growth than armed conflict. In addition, Governments had to face the devastation which human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) was wreaking on their economies and societies.

“16. Above all, countries must invest in education. He had urged Member States to endorse the target of universal primary school enrolment by 2015. Two thirds of the more than 110 million children who were not in school were girls. Families must be persuaded that schooling for their daughters was every bit as valuable as schooling for their sons. Next week, in partnership with more than a dozen entities in the United Nations system, including the World Bank, he was launching a new initiative entitled ‘Educate girls now’.

“17. No country was likely to fully join the new global economy unless its government and people applied themselves to that task. Yet developing countries needed full and free market access for their products to attract the investments required to achieve high growth and trade their way out of poverty. Only if they were freed from the shackles of debt servicing could the poorest countries devote an appropriate share of their revenue to anti-poverty programmes. Only with generous financial assistance from the industrialized world could countries that had worked hard to reform their economies provide their poor citizens with the basic social services.

“18. The Millennium Report had sought to mobilize the world’s energy around a common, achievable agenda. Finance ministers and development cooperation ministers had a crucial role to play, especially as intensive consultations on a high-level intergovernmental event on financing for development continued. The work of finance ministers today encompassed a broad canvas; they were not being asked simply to fund this or that programme but to help find solutions.

“19. The Secretary-General added that ministers had recently witnessed in Washington, D.C., the vehemence with which people were debating the merits and demerits of globalization, making demands on international organizations and telling what more should be done. There was a need to turn that ferment, that confrontational energy into something constructive that benefited all people and which all people could support.

“Chairman of the Development Committee

“20. The Chairman of the Development Committee noted that the theme which ran virtually the entire agenda of the Development Committee meeting the previous day had been poverty reduction. On the eve of the meeting a broad-ranging discussion had taken place in which the President of the World Bank and the Acting Managing Director of IMF had participated. The exchanges of the Committee had been comprehensive and often provocative; perhaps future discussions of the group could prove helpful to the preparation of the financing for development event.

“21. It had been encouraging to hear from finance and development ministries on the AIDS crisis: HIV/AIDS weakened economic growth, governance, human capital, labour productivity and the investment climate, thereby undermining the foundations of development and poverty reduction. Ministers had supported a global strategy, which placed requirements for action on all key actors, including the national authorities. The President of the World Bank had committed the Bank to funding any viable AIDS projects that members might propose. The participation of the World Bank in the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) partnership had been especially welcomed; the UNAIDS Director, Peter Piot, had made an excellent contribution to the discussion.

“22. In addressing the interrelationships among trade, development and poverty reduction, the Development Committee had noted that accelerated and sustainable growth was a necessary condition for reducing poverty, and that more open economies tended to grow faster than closed economies. Industrialized countries had been urged by several members of the Development Committee to open their markets wider for products of poor countries, particularly agricultural commodities and textiles. While the need for developing countries to reduce trade barriers would not be neglected, many ministers had stressed the increasingly wide “trade divide” between unequal partners. Thus, special consideration should be given to extend to the poorest countries comprehensive and predictable duty and quota-free market access. Since a large number of poor countries were not integrating successfully into the international trading system because of the absence of adequate infrastructure, institutions and social programmes, the efforts of these countries to expand trade should be integrated into a comprehensive framework for development.

“23. Ministers had been pleased at the progress achieved since the inception of the poverty reduction strategy papers (PRSPs). They urged the World Bank and IMF to continue to work collaboratively with member Governments and other development partners to help develop these strategies. Since country ownership was the most critical feature of these strategies, the advice of the Bretton Woods institutions needed to be provided with care and sensitivity. Regarding the tension between moving between having properly developed poverty reduction strategies and quicker heavily indebted poor countries (HIPC) debt relief, interim measures had been introduced for use during a transition period. An important feature of the discussion was the encouragement to bilateral and multilateral agencies to increasingly align their assistance programmes to these strategies, thereby strengthening donor coordination and reducing excessive burdens on developing country Governments.

“24. In concluding, the Chairman of the Development Committee noted that the recent discussions of the Committee had reflected the daily work of the World Bank and IMF, often in close partnership with United Nations agencies. What was going on in the streets near such discussions had led ministers to stress the importance they attach to preserve and further strengthen the family of multilateral institutions as a powerful force for global progress, equity and stability.

“Acting Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund

“25. The Acting Managing Director of IMF presented the results of the recent meeting of the International Monetary and Financial Committee, formerly the Interim Committee. The discussion on the global economic outlook had indicated an increase in world growth, with no significant increase in underlying inflation. The global growth rate in 2000 was expected to be 4.2 per cent, the highest in 10 years.

“26. In its discussions on globalization and the poverty issue, the Committee had emphasized the need to complete funding for the HIPC initiative. It had to be recognized that regional banks did not have enough funds to contribute to the initiative. Regarding development, there had been no successful growth strategies that had not involved integration into the world economy. There was a need for further trade liberalization in developed countries, in particular for enhanced market access to poor countries. Coherence between market access and debt relief to assist HIPC countries was necessary.

“27. On the issues and questions raised in the note by the Secretary-General on strengthening international financial arrangements and addressing poverty (E/2000/8), the Acting Managing Director of IMF noted that surveillance by IMF had expanded markedly and that work on standards and codes had progressed significantly. The International Monetary and Financial Committee had not accepted recent proposals to narrow the functions of IMF. The Fund was also concerned about representation issues in some international financial forums, such as the Financial Stability Forum. But it should be noted that the views of the latter were also submitted to IMF. There had also been significant progress on issues regarding private sector involvement in crisis resolution. On transparency, there had been major changes: IMF now published almost everything, as opposed to five years ago, when it published almost nothing.

“Chairman of the Group of 10

“28. The Chairman of the Group of 10 said that the Asian financial crisis had revealed weaknesses in domestic financial structures. Work was still necessary to identify vulnerabilities. Progress achieved in discussions on codes of good practices and increased transparency should be accompanied by efforts at implementation. Prudential financial indicators were important for emerging developing markets, particularly since the private sector must be able to evaluate risks.

“29. Generally, building up short-term debt was not sustainable. Once a financial crisis erupted, IMF had an important role to play. It was also necessary to involve the private sector when huge amounts were involved. This suggested to involve the private sector when reforms were being considered.

“30. A more stable international financial system would be beneficial to all. He agreed with the Acting Managing Director of IMF on the need for participation of developing countries in international forums. The Bretton Woods institutions were the right place for discussing far-reaching reforms since they were really representative. While the voice of civil society also should be heard in international forums, there was still the issue of legitimacy of some groups that should be resolved at the national level.

“31. Protection of the poor from financial shocks was crucial. While short-term debt should not pile up, the Bretton Woods institutions should play their role in poverty alleviation. PRSPs allowed countries to do more long-term development planning, and within a macro-stability framework had the potential to increase the efficiency of aid. Increased aid efficiency and good governance were key to overcoming the aid fatigue of donor countries.

“Chairman of the Group of 24

“32. The Chairman of the Group of 24 said that the global economic outlook provided an optimistic prospect but significant risks persisted: an uncertain response of the Japanese economy to fiscal stimulus and a possible hard landing of the United States economy. Growth in developing countries had been better than expected but the recovery had been uneven. Appropriate financial policies of developed countries, particularly less reliance on high interest rates, could contribute significantly to poverty reduction and faster economic growth in developing countries.

“33. The strengthening of the international financial architecture remained an important task. Much work was necessary to reduce vulnerabilities in emerging market economies derived from abrupt changes in capital flows and terms of trade. IMF surveillance should be applied to all members, with special attention to the international implications of the domestic policies of the largest economies. In the same vein, transparency and good practices should be followed by all countries. Yet observance of international standards should be voluntary, depending on the conditions of individual countries.

“34. Regarding the involvement of the private sector, an operational framework to prevent and resolve financial crises should be developed. IMF should continue to play an advisory role in resolving financial crises, facilitating debt restructuring between creditors and debtors. The IMF facilities needed some streamlining and were important for addressing imbalances. The Contingency Credit Line needed a review to be more useful.

“35. The Group of 24 supported the work of the Bretton Woods institutions. It was important to strengthen them as key international institutions. A quick completion of the required financing for the HIPC initiative was critical. Burden-sharing needed to be equitable and more bilateral resources were necessary for the International Development Association and regional development banks to make progress in the HIPC initiative.

“36. In concluding, the Chairman of the Group of 24 urged donor countries to increase official development assistance (ODA).

“III. The dialogue

“37. After the introductory statements a rich dialogue ensued, in which ministers of finance, ministers of development cooperation and a total of 27 permanent representatives took the floor. The speakers focused on the set of issues brought up in the introductory statements, as well as the note by the Secretary-General on strengthening international financial arrangements and addressing poverty (E/2000/8), which addressed two subjects: reform of the global financial system and fighting poverty in developing countries. Four main themes emerged from the deliberations: the state of the world economy, globalization and international trade; strengthening the global financial system; development and poverty reduction; and the institutional dimensions to promote faster economic growth and enhance international cooperation for development.

“A. State of the world economy, globalization and international trade “38. The world economy had started to recover in 1999. The prospects, as perceived by most participants, were for an even stronger growth in 2000. Yet significant risks existed that called for judicious policies in the largest industrialized countries. The current recovery, although present in both the North and the South, was uneven. Some developing countries had not benefited, and in several of those whose economy was expanding per capita incomes were still below pre-crisis levels.

“39. A positive feature was the worldwide decline in inflation and, with a few exceptions, narrowing of imbalances. Several participants stressed that it was necessary to continue to manage macroeconomic policies carefully to ensure sustained and widespread economic growth. This was especially true of large industrialized countries with a considerable weight in the world economy. In the United States, monetary and fiscal policies should remain prudent. European countries, besides maintaining cautious macroeconomic policies, should make further progress in labour, capital and product-market reforms to ensure that the pace of growth was sustained. In Japan, macroeconomic policies should be supportive of aggregate demand until recovery in domestic consumption and investment was firmly established.

“40. In the light of those recent positive developments, according to many ministers, the persistence of marginalization, exclusion and inequality among countries was striking, as was the increasing number of poor in the world. The situation in Africa and many other poor countries was still a cause for particular concern. Globalization was not leading to equitable development. Benefits of increased integration into the world economy were concentrated in a few countries, particularly those more technologically advanced. The new global economy was based on information. According to some speakers, it was necessary to end the dominance of a few countries in information technology and widen the access to all countries.

“41. A number of participants underlined the strong link between globalization and change. Globalization diminished boundaries. It implied the sharing of ideas and facilitated the adoption of best practices. It promoted social equality and development. It spurred growth, which was critical to poverty alleviation since no substantial alleviation of global poverty could be achieved without sustainable economic growth.

“42. Since many developing countries were encountering problems in taking advantage of the globalized financial markets and information technology, the need for international cooperation had grown. Several ministers said that globalization had transformed the context of the United Nations role in development. The United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions must work together to spread the benefits of globalization and to bring them to the poor.

“43. The ongoing world economic recovery was leading to increased international trade and some improvements in commodity prices. Yet the results of liberalization for developing countries were not yet clear. Support for opening trade further still hinged on tangible results from past liberalization efforts. Some ministers pointed out that developed countries too often preached openness while protecting their own markets.

“44. Trade expansion was seen by many ministers as critical for development and poverty reduction. International trade was particularly important for small- and medium-sized economies, especially for landlocked countries and more vulnerable countries, such as small island States. A number of ministers underlined the need to truly open the markets of developed countries to developing countries products. Ensuring a wider market access to poor countries and least developed countries was a crucial step to facilitate poverty eradication, especially for highly indebted poor countries. Solving the debt problem and alleviating poverty required progress on both fronts: debt relief or debt forgiveness and increased exports.

“B. Strengthening the global financial system

45. Several speakers stressed that the reform of the international financial system was necessary to enable developing countries to benefit from globalization. According to many participants, the views of the International Monetary and Financial Committee of IMF on the directions in which IMF and the international financial system should evolve deserved full support. The environment was changing rapidly, so further steps were required. An important consideration was that the financial system had to be more responsive to the challenges developing countries were facing and to achieving the goals agreed at the global conferences of the 1990s.

“46. More progress was needed to better prevent and address financial crises, according to many speakers. Several participants stressed the need for reform of the domestic financial system, appropriate sequencing of capital account liberalization and sound liability management. IMF surveillance was a main tool to prevent crisis but should apply to the policies of all countries. Many speakers underlined the importance of regulations for and capacity-building in the banking system and other financial institutions of developing countries.

“47. In improving the system, the formulation and adoption of codes and standards in the financial and corporate sector were important to reduce instability. Several ministers underlined that in the context of its surveillance function IMF should promote transparency and the implementation of internationally agreed codes and standards. Yet a number of participants stressed that while formulating rules and standards it was important to take into account the concerns of all countries, large and small, including developing countries. Codes and standards of prudent conduct — essential for financial stability — needed to be prepared in a more democratic way to ensure that they were adapted to different countries’ situation and that countries considered them to be legitimate. Still, for some participants, the adoption of these codes and standards should remain a voluntary choice.

“48. There was widespread agreement on the need to strengthen the family of international financial institutions. Several ministers underlined that the global conferences of the 1990s should be an overarching objective of the Bretton Woods institutions. A key focus of the World Bank should be poverty reduction. IMF had a key role in maintaining international financial stability, surveillance and catalytic support for countries to regain balance-of-payments equilibrium or to maintain or to regain access to capital markets.

“49. The general view was that it was not advisable to reorient IMF towards short-term lending. While some streamlining of facilities was needed, the current programme of IMF deserved support. Some delegations felt that IMF’s provision of short-term resources to confront a crisis in a member country should not be limited as it is at present. A view was also expressed that IMF should concentrate on macroeconomic issues as part of a new division of labour between IMF and the World Bank. The focus of the World Bank on poverty eradication and human-centred development was supported strongly by most speakers. Its work was complementary to IMF. Collaboration and harmonization between the two were therefore crucial to prevent duplication of work and inefficient policies.

“50. Private financial flows had become a major share of total financial flows among countries. Many participants called for more involvement of the private sector in the prevention and resolution of financial crises. This should help to avoid moral hazard and to facilitate more orderly adjustment in countries facing payments problems.

“51. In the view of many ministers, the upcoming high-level international intergovernmental event on financing for development presented a momentous opportunity to deal with the issues discussed above. The process was a propitious occasion to address economic and social development in a coherent fashion and bring together the Bretton Woods institutions, the World Trade Organization (WTO), the regional development banks and other relevant stakeholders involved in international development cooperation to work together in innovative ways; each had key pieces of the international development system and the process could pull these pieces together.

“52. The high-level event was expected to address a broad range of issues, including the international financial system, sustained financial flows for development, a comprehensive debt strategy, and poverty eradication. Many participants emphasized the importance of addressing burden-sharing between creditors and debtors; coherence between international trade, financial and monetary systems; governance of the international financial system; and responsiveness to the challenges of development.

“53. The shaping of the financing for development process was a task of all those present at the meeting. A broad participation was important. The Bretton Woods institutions should feed their agendas into the process. In the view of several participants, without the involvement of the Bretton Woods institutions the process would be meaningless. It was hoped that the World Bank and IMF would support the initiative and participate actively. The Executive Board of the World Bank had proposed constructive modalities for participation and collaboration. It was proposed that equally effective modalities would be suggested and approved by IMF and WTO.

“54. The participation of other stakeholders — the private sector, non-governmental organizations — was also important. Also, regional frameworks and their related activities should constitute necessary building blocks for the process. In terms of guiding overall objectives, some ministers stressed the principle of equity as a key consideration as well as taking into account the outcome of the social summit and other global conferences.

“55. Several participants emphasized that the United Nations had a central role to play in fostering international dialogue and cooperation and global governance. The United Nations had a comparative advantage in terms of its leadership in social policy, and should use its comparative advantage to design an international financial strategy with social impact.

“C. Development and poverty reduction

“56. Sustained development and poverty eradication required high economic growth and targeted programmes for the poor. To achieve this, many countries needed additional international support. Increasing ODA was necessary. Several ministers stressed that a major effort should be deployed to attain the international ODA target.

“57. A number of participants noted that the social perspective was key to the work of the Bretton Woods institutions. It was stressed that the resources should be channelled to the poorest countries. Fighting poverty in an era of wealth and prosperity was an imperative, but wars were blocking the poverty eradication cause. It was thus crucial to address the reduction in military expenditures.

“58. The common country assessment, the United Nations Development Assistance Framework (UNDAF), the comprehensive development framework and PRSPs were promising tools in the emergence of a new development system. For these tools to work, multilateral institutions and donor countries must pool their resources and harmonize their efforts, while recipient countries must take the lead in overall coordination. Ownership by the recipient country was critical. Indeed, UNDAF and the comprehensive development framework as well as PRSPs were intended to help countries to define their own strategies. While aid was important, countries themselves were the principal agents in their own restructuring. National policies were key to development. Good governance and institution-building were crucial to the success of economic and social reform and helped countries to effectively use scarce resources.

“59. In view of the complexity of the PRSPs process, the World Bank and IMF should work together with member Governments and other development partners. United Nations programmes and specialized agencies should actively assist in formulating and implementing PRSPs if so requested by the countries concerned. UNDP could play an important role in capacity-building and enhancing the public sector capabilities.

“60. The IMF role was critical in macroeconomic policy advice. It was also critical that the people affected by the programmes and policies of PRSPs be involved in the formulation process. Several participants pointed out that the European Union was also providing support to reduce poverty in European transition economies.

“61. The HIPC initiative was to be seen as a major international effort to promote economic and social equity with a view to eradicating poverty. The proposals by the Bretton Woods institutions and others to make the debt relief under the HIPC initiative deeper, broader and faster were welcome. Germany had decided to forgive all debt of countries in which the HIPC was being implemented, including commercial debt. Some ministries called for more resources to implement the initiative, particularly from Group of Seven countries. Also, the dual objective of moving quickly on implementing the initiative and having high quality PRSPs had led to some tension. Some flexibility was required in the PRSPs process. The limited capacity of a country to develop the strategy should not prevent it from benefiting from debt relief. Furthermore, it was important to develop adequate indicators to gauge how poverty conditions and the number of poor were changing over time.

“62. A far greater effort, according to many ministers, was needed to truly open markets to developing country products and give them a chance to grow out of poverty. Proposals to lift barriers on the poorer countries’ exports should be strongly supported and acted upon. The commitments in previous trade negotiations should be adjusted to grant free market access to all goods from the least developed countries. Increased access, including quota-free access, essential for poor countries, should also be considered for middle-income countries. In the end, what was crucial for self-reliant development was not aid but trade.

“D. Institutional dimensions

“63. Collaboration between the Economic and Social Council and the Bretton Woods institutions reflected the need to deal simultaneously with the economic and financial aspects and social dimensions of development in an era of globalization. Global issues and concerns were not bound to be dealt with by one organ exclusively. The boundaries between institutions and fields of responsibility had become more open. Some participants said that the time had arrived for a more fundamental coordination and cohesion between the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council and the Bretton Woods institutions. Progress had to be made in dealing with the link between security and development.

“64. Poverty issues were an area in which system-wide cooperation was required. The role of international financial institutions in coping with poverty eradication was beyond doubt. Still, the division of labour among multilateral institutions was important. A number of ministers stressed that a distinct focus for the various institutions was necessary.

“65. Many ministers stated the need for equitable and strong representation of all members in international institutions. The same was true for other international rule-making bodies whose proposals or decisions affected the world community at large. In the case of the Bretton Woods institutions, according to some speakers the Group of Seven shared over 46 per cent of the decision-making in these bodies. At the same time, the facilities of the World Bank and IMF were used largely by countries with poor representation. This situation, largely explained by historic reasons, should be re-examined. A number of speakers noted that the existing constituency system of the Bretton Woods institutions gave, in principle, ample opportunity to each member country to present its views. It was thus important to make it work effectively.

“66. Globalization and interrelations among the various issues of relevance to the international community had increased the need for coordination. In particular, enhancing coordination between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions, between the latter and WTO and between multilateral institutions and bilateral efforts was critical.

“67. The upcoming high-level event on financing for development provided a good opportunity to establish new working modalities between the United Nations, the Bretton Woods institutions and WTO. The approach taken jointly by the United Nations and the World Bank in the context of the financing for development process was an important step forward.

“68. At the domestic level, it was noted that only the strongest could afford weak institutions. In developing countries, institution-building was part and parcel of the development process. The lessons in countries with economies in transition had also showed the critical importance of advancing simultaneously in institution-building and macroeconomic and structural policies. Yet institution-building was a long-term process. It was pointed out that cooperation with international organizations to enhance national capacity for institution-building remained a key ingredient for sustainable development.

“IV. Concluding remarks

“69. After the last speaker, the President of the Council requested the Managing Director of the World Bank to derive key conclusions from the dialogue. He also invited the Chairman of the Development Committee, the Acting Managing Director of IMF, the Chairman of the Group of 10 and the Chairman of the Group of 24 to reflect on the questions raised by some of the participants.

“70. The Managing Director of the World Bank noted that it was clear that the United Nations and Bretton Woods institutions were working in unison. There was a growing consensus on a number of objectives. He pointed out the increasing convergence of views on development and global financial system reform based on a common set of objectives, with poverty reduction as the overarching goal. It could be expected that the financing for development process would bring the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions together even further. PRSPs were important for the consideration of debt relief and the latter’s link to poverty eradication. He agreed with the participants that the formulation of the strategy implied a trade-off between quality and speed. In any event, partnership and ownership by the recipient country were essential. The formulation of the strategy could provide the context for examining military expenditure.

“71. Funding the HIPC initiative was a major challenge. Although $2.4 billion had been pledged, that amount was only a fraction of what was needed over the next few years. The overall debt relief provided amounted to $15 billion and was a crucial part of the process to move ahead. He hoped that the middle-income countries would not participate as beneficiaries of the HIPC initiative but grow out of debt and preserve access to capital markets. In any event, the Paris Club was available to consider their situation.

“72. There was a seamless collaboration between the Bretton Woods institutions and WTO. WTO had participated fully in the recent spring 2000 meetings in Washington, D.C. Four areas of work of the Bretton Woods institutions were important in this context: financial support; integrated framework for reviewing country experiences; capacity-building; and strengthening work on research, especially on trade barriers.

“73. Commenting on the dialogue, the Chairman of the Group of 10 noted that in the Bretton Woods institutions representation was organized according to economic strength reflected in the quota share. Thus, constituencies were a legitimate form of representation. Institutional rules were well defined. If they became inadequate they should be adapted in a process that should take place within the institutions themselves.

“74. With regard to the modalities of IMF participation in the high-level event, the Acting Managing Director of IMF noted that while the Board had not yet discussed the subject, it would find ways to participate in a constructive manner. Referring to trade issues, he pointed out that both trade and aid could help countries that are pursuing good policies. For any country, trade liberalization was one of the best ways to integrate into the global economy.

“75. As to the methods of cooperation between the World Bank and IMF, he noted that basic cooperation took place more on an informal basis. In some areas, formal modes of cooperation existed, such as the financial sector committee and the joint implementation committee on the HIPC initiative. With respect to the latter, he noted that IMF had to take into account the social and budgetary implications of the policies to be implemented. While the advice of IMF or the World Bank was important, countries’ strategies were more important.

“76. Standards and codes of prudential conduct were voluntary. IMF had a programme of financial sector assistance, which was purely of assistance to those countries which had requested them. Turning to the question of military expenditures, he noted that while IMF did not consider what happened with regard to a country’s military budget, it did report on military expenditures. That had not previously been accepted as part of the surveillance process but the situation was changing. He added that it was hard to make the case for debt relief when some countries had massive military expenditures for purposes unknown.

“77. The Chairman of the Group of 24 agreed with the view that donors, especially the Group of Seven, should make greater efforts to fund the HIPC initiative. Regarding trade issues, he stressed that industrialized countries should also liberalize, particularly in the area of agricultural products and textiles.

“78. In his closing remarks, the President of the Council noted that the meeting seemed to agree that there was a need to take advantage of the current easing of crises to push ahead in the consideration of further reforms, in a context that would foster the further integration of the developing and transition economies into the global economy. The meeting had welcomed the increased transparency of the international financial institutions. It was also clear that the evolving structure of international institutions was incomplete, in particular as regards involving developing and transition economies in drawing up prudential norms and standards. One fundamental consideration in the United Nations was to see a strong IMF and World Bank since those institutions were essential for global economic and financial stability and for development. The meeting had also reconfirmed the critical role of the private sector in finance and entrepreneurship, whether at national or international levels. A model of responsive involvement of the private sector in national financial development had to be built, during times of economic “boom” as well as to participate in times of economic crisis. At the same time, Governments must play a role that the private sector could not perform, in particular in such areas as fighting poverty or HIV/AIDS, and more generally to work towards the goals of equity and fairness. Governments and multilateral institutions needed to work together to provide free market access to developing countries, particularly the least developed countries. Key commitments agreed at conferences could only be achieved if growth in developing countries was accelerated through sound national policies supported by increased ODA and strengthened debt relief as an integral part of an overall framework for broad-based development. It was hoped that the poverty reduction strategies papers process would work effectively, fairly and expeditiously and would be accompanied by the necessary resource flows, especially for the heavily indebted poor countries. The meeting had demonstrated the value of the high-level dialogue between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions in promoting and deepening understanding between the two sets of institutions. The General Assembly high-level intergovernmental event on financing for development, to be held in 2001, would be the culmination of an open process of interaction with all relevant stakeholders, including the Bretton Woods institutions and civil society, and the President hoped that that forum would be fully used.”

After its adoption, statements were made by the representatives of the United States, Nigeria (on behalf of the Group of 77) and France (on behalf of the European Union). The Under-Secretary-General for Economic and Social Affairs made a statement. The text of the declaration read as follows:

Ministerial declaration of the high-level segment submitted by the President of the Council

Development and international cooperation in the twenty-first century: the role of information technology in the context of a knowledge-based global economy

"1. We, the Ministers and Heads of Delegations participating in the high-level segment of the substantive session of 2000 of the Economic and Social Council, held from 5 to 7 July 2000, having considered the theme "Development and international cooperation in the twenty-first century: the role of information technology in the context of a knowledge-based global economy", have adopted the following declaration.

"2. We recognize a wide consensus that information and communication technologies (ICT) are central to the creation of the emerging global knowledge-based economy and can play an important role in accelerating growth, in promoting sustainable development and eradicating poverty in developing countries as well as countries with economies in transition and in facilitating their effective integration into the global economy. We note with appreciation the emphasis placed on ICT in the Secretary-General's reports to the forthcoming Millennium Summit and the high-level segment of the Economic and Social Council. This consensus is reflected most recently in the declaration of the South Summit held in Havana. We note the priority being accorded to this subject in the preparations for the G-8 Summit to be held in Okinawa, Japan.

"3. We appreciate the efforts deployed by all countries, including at the regional level, in preparing for the high-level segment of the substantive session of 2000 of the Economic and Social Council, in particular the organization of the African Development Forum 1999: The challenge to Africa of globalization and the information age, held in October 1999, the Latin American and Caribbean Seminar on Information Technology and Development, held in Florianopolis, Brazil, in June 2000, and the Regional Round Table on Information Technology and Development for the Asia and Pacific Region, held in New Delhi, India in June 2000. We take note of the Florianopolis Declaration and of the recommendations of the Regional Round Table.

"4. The ICT revolution opens vast new opportunities for economic growth and social development but also poses challenges and risks. Along with important economic and social benefits, it can lead to further widening disparities between and within countries. While considering the impact of ICT on the creation of a global knowledge-based economy, we highlight that the majority of the world population still lives in poverty and remains untouched by the ICT revolution. The emerging new economy, characterized by a rapidly increasing reliance of value creation on information and knowledge, still remains concentrated in the developed countries. Unless access to and use of ICT is broadened, the majority of people particularly in the developing countries will not enjoy the benefits of the new knowledge-based economy.

"5. We are deeply concerned that, at present, ICT's huge potential for advancing development, in particular of the developing countries, has not been fully captured. This reality has given rise to manifestations of the "digital divide". In this regard, urgent and concerted actions at the national, regional and international levels are imperative for bridging the digital divide and building digital opportunities and putting ICT firmly in the service of development for all. In this regard, we call on all members of the international community to work cooperatively to bridge the digital divide and to foster "digital opportunity". In this context, we recognize the need to address the major impediments to the participation of the majority of the people in the developing countries in the revolution of ICT, such as lack of infrastructure, education, capacity-building, investment and connectivity.

"6. ICT provides unique opportunities for economic growth and human development. It can shape and enhance a wide range of development applications — from electronic commerce to access to financial markets; from generating employment to providing opportunities for investment to entrepreneurs, in particular small and medium-sized enterprises; from improved agricultural and manufacturing productivity to the empowerment of all sections of society; from long-distance education to tele-medicine, from environmental management and monitoring to prevention and management of disasters. The potential to help foster sustainable development, empower people, including women and youth, build capacities and skills, assist small- and medium-sized enterprises, reduce poverty, and reinforce popular participation and informed decision-making at all levels is enormous. The promotion of ICT should not be a substitute for the efforts to ensure the development and modernization of basic sectors of the economy but should complement and enhance these efforts.

"7. Access to information and knowledge-sharing is largely determined by education, capabilities, including resources, transparent societies, capacity to generate and utilize knowledge, connectivity and the availability of diverse content and applications, and the policy and legal/regulatory framework. These areas require urgent action at the national and international levels to improve the capacity of all countries, particularly the developing countries and countries with economies in transition, to participate in the knowledge-based economy in order to promote their economic and social development.

“8. Efforts to achieve universal connectivity, particularly at the lower income levels, in all countries and especially in developing countries, will require innovative approaches and partnerships, including group and community connectivity and private-sector investment. In this regard, the establishment of integrated multipurpose and multimedia community information centres will be important.

“9. In addition to establishing connectivity, capacity (human as well as institutional) is critical in sustaining access and ensuring that its benefits are captured by society. Investment in education, including basic and digital literacy, remains the fundamental way of developing human capacity and should be at the heart of any national, regional and international information technology strategy.

“10. Besides connectivity and human and institutional capacities, the availability of diverse content can encourage access. The development of local content on the Internet and the ability of people to freely access it will help foster a culturally and linguistically diverse cyberspace and encourage broad and sustainable use of the Internet. Local content can also facilitate entrance to the knowledge-based economy for individuals and firms in developing countries and also as a means to expand their participation in the new networked economy.

“11. The ability to use ICT could contribute to the improvement of the capabilities of firms, including small and medium-sized enterprises, especially in developing countries, to participate in international markets. Electronic commerce offers the possibility to increase opportunities to access world markets and to accelerate economic growth. Towards that end, concerted efforts are needed at the national, regional and international levels to create a conducive environment. In this context, special attention should be paid to those countries that lack the capacity to effectively participate in electronic commerce.

“12. Market forces are fundamental but they alone will not suffice to put ICT in the service of development. Effective and meaningful collaborative efforts are required, involving Governments, multilateral development institutions, bilateral donors, the private sector, civil society and other relevant stakeholders, to enhance the developmental impact of ICT. Such efforts should include transfer of technology to developing countries on concessional and preferential terms, as mutually agreed, especially technology related to knowledge-based sectors, the mobilization of resources from all sources, public and private, at the national and international levels, and promoting capacity-building.

“13. We recognize that consistent and coherent actions at the national and local levels are essential for making ICT for development programmes effective and sustainable and appropriate to the particular national and local context. In this regard, best practices and lessons learned by countries and communities that have already implemented ICT programmes need to be drawn from and built upon. Developed countries should share with developing and transition economy countries their experience in promoting and establishing ICT sectors in their own economies so that mistakes are avoided and benefits maximized.

“14. National programmes for putting ICT in the service of development must be integrated into national development strategies, as defined and implemented on the basis of national priorities and on the principle of national ownership of such strategies. These programmes need to enunciate a national vision of challenges and approaches, establish national priorities and, as appropriate, a national focal point, and provide a conducive environment for the rapid diffusion, development and use of information technology. These national programmes could include, inter alia:

(a) Establishing a transparent and consistent legal and regulatory framework that foster ICT development including, as appropriate, by removing impediments to growth in the ICT sector;

(b) Development of the basic infrastructure necessary for connectivity including for most remote areas;

(c) Application of ICT, wherever possible, in public institutions, such as schools, hospitals, libraries, government departments and agencies;

(d) Generation, development and enhancement of local content transmitted by ICT through, inter alia, the introduction of local language character sets;

(e) Promoting access to ICT for all by supporting the provision of public access points;

(f) Measures to bring down connectivity costs to make it affordable, including through market-based mechanisms and competition, as appropriate;

(g) Development of appropriate policies to promote investment in ICT sector;

(h) Making the necessary investment in human resource development and strengthening the institutions and networks for the production, acquisition, absorption and dissemination of knowledge products;

(i) Technical preparation of national manpower for securing national capacities to administrate information systems and to develop sustainable ICT projects;

(j) Promoting the digital enhancement of already established mass media;

(k) Developing strategies to link established technologies, such as radio and television, with new technologies, such as the Internet;

(l) Promotion of the creation of technological incubators linked to universities and centres for research.

“15. The United Nations system, in particular the Economic and Social Council, can play a key role in promoting synergies and coherence of all efforts directed to expand the development impact of ICT in the following ways:

(a) Supporting national actions aimed at harnessing the potential of ICT for development through providing assistance to developing countries and countries with economies in transition aimed at fully and beneficially integrating them into the networked knowledge-based global economy, and strengthening their capacity in building infrastructure and generating content;

(b) Serving as a global forum to accelerate and promote universal access to knowledge and information, contribute, as appropriate, within their respective mandate to the development of norms and standards on a transparent, meaningful and participatory basis, taking into account in a balanced manner, development priorities and incentive for innovations and contribute to addressing such issues as cultural diversity, information ethics, privacy, security and cyber-crime;

(c) Contributing to a more systematic, ongoing identification, review and dissemination, especially at the regional level, including through networks of learning communities, of ICT expertise, distance learning programmes, information and reliable data on ICT, case studies, best practices and successful models, thus becoming an important ‘knowledge bank’ in this field;

(d) Emphasizing the importance of universal access to knowledge and information for promoting development;

(e) Providing global leadership in bridging the digital divide and promoting digital opportunity, and adopting, in order to enhance the capacity of the United Nations system to achieve these goals, a coherent system-wide ICT strategy that would ensure coordination and synergy among programmes and activities of individual organizations of the system and transform it into a knowledge-based system of organizations;

(f) Promoting the complementary roles of old and new media in bridging the ‘digital divide’, through, inter alia, the United Nations TV Forum;

(g) Bringing together the relevant actors from the public and private sectors to build partnership.

“16. All members of the international community should make a commitment, at the highest level to strive to bridge the digital divide and to bringing ICT to the service of development and all the peoples of the world. Adequate resources need to be mobilized and committed for achieving this goal. Stronger partnerships are needed among the donor community and between donors and recipients in order to avoid wasteful duplication and to foster collaboration and openness including amongst multilateral development institutions.

“17. We call upon the international community, including the relevant international organizations, funds and programmes, and specialized agencies of the United Nations system, to urgently:

(a) Promote programmes to intensify cooperation, especially South-South cooperation, in ICT for development projects, including ideas and projects for enhancing direct connectivity among developing countries;

(b) Actively explore new, creative financing initiatives for ICT through appropriate arrangements involving all relevant stakeholders, including the private sector;

(c) Devise measures to substantially reduce the average cost of access to the Internet within developing countries;

(d) Promote measures to increase the number of computers and other Internet access devices in developing countries;

(e) Explore measures to facilitate access to ICT training;

(f) Explore and find ways to promote and facilitate investment in the research and development of technologies, products and services that would contribute to raising the literacy and skill levels in developing countries;

(g) Facilitate the transfer of information and communication technologies, in particular to developing countries, and support efforts towards capacity-building and production of content;

(h) Encourage research and development on technology and applications adapted to specific requirements in developing countries, including distance learning, community-based training, digital alphabetization, tele-medicine, interoperability of networks, and natural disaster prevention and mitigation;

(i) Explore and define ways and means to strengthen the use of ICT in small and medium-sized enterprises in developing countries and countries with economies in transition as these enterprises constitute a major source of employment, and also to enhance their competitiveness in the emerging global economy.

“18. Partnerships, involving national Governments, bilateral and multilateral development actors, the private sectors, and other relevant stakeholders, should play a key role. In this context, we note the proposal contained in paragraph 11 of the report of the high-level panel of experts convened from 17 to 20 April 2000 that the United Nations create an ICT task force, and we request the Working Group on Informatics to make recommendations regarding that proposal. The Working Group may submit its recommendations to the Council for its consideration.

“19. The Economic and Social Council should review the mandates and activities of its subsidiary bodies dealing with ICT with a view to establishing modalities to provide the United Nations and Governments with comprehensive, practical and action-oriented advice on policies and programmes and on new developments in the field of ICT for development.

“20. We recommend the endorsement of the present declaration at the Millennium Assembly.

“21. We call upon Governments, the United Nations system, and the other members of the international community to urgently translate the present declaration into coherent and concerted actions. We request the Secretary-General to initiate, on an urgent and priority basis, all necessary steps to implement the present declaration, and to submit a progress report to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 2001.”

6. At the same meeting, the Council adopted the draft agreed conclusions. The text read as follows:

“Agreed conclusions 2000/1

“1. The Economic and Social Council, together with the General Assembly and the Commission on Human Settlements, constitutes a three-tiered intergovernmental mechanism to oversee the coordination of activities for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda.^{1 2}

“2. The Council takes note of the efforts of the Commission on Human Settlements in promoting, reviewing, monitoring and assessing progress made in implementing the twin goals of the Habitat Agenda: adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development,³ recognizing that the overall thrust of the new strategic vision for the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements and its emphasis on two global campaigns, concerning secure tenure and urban governance, are strategic points of entry for the effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda.

“3. The Council stresses the need for and critical role of capacity-building and international cooperation in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda.

“4. The Council requests the relevant United Nations bodies and agencies, in particular the Executive Committee of the United Nations Development Group, to undertake a review of the follow-up of their commitments on implementing the goals of the Habitat Agenda, as part of the preparatory process for the special session of the General Assembly for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II).

“5. The Commission on Human Settlements acting as the preparatory committee for the special session is encouraged to look at ways to ensure that the specialized agencies and other United Nations system organizations cooperate closely with it in the preparatory process for the special session.

“6. Recalling General Assembly resolution 35/77 C of December 1980, the Economic and Social Council requests the Secretary-General to review the matter of the participation of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements in all aspects of the work of the Administrative Committee on Coordination and its subsidiary machinery, in the light of its role as focal point within the United Nations system on implementing the Habitat Agenda.

“7. The Council also invites the Administrative Committee on Coordination to include in the agenda of its meetings issues relating to the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, and requests the Secretary-General to organize regular briefings to inform Member States on the Committee’s deliberations.

“8. The Council notes the proposal to merge existing initiatives into a streamlined Urban Forum.

“9. The Council calls upon national Governments, local authorities and other partners to renew their commitments towards the implementation of the Habitat Agenda and to intensify the scope and level of preparatory activities at the local, national and regional levels. In this context, the Council notes the creation of the Advisory Committee of Local Authorities to advise the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements on the role of local authorities in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda.

“10. The Council emphasizes the particular significance of the commitments of the Habitat Agenda with regard to cross-cutting issues (e.g., sustainable human settlements, urban poverty, gender, involvement of the civil society), and recommends their inclusion when setting up working agendas for future coordination segments of the Council.

“11. The Council welcomes the progress made during the first session of the Commission on Human Settlements acting as the preparatory committee for the special session of the General Assembly for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), including its decision to discuss a declaration on cities and human settlements in the new millennium, to be adopted by the General Assembly at the special session.⁴

“12. The Council requests the Secretary-General to consider adopting a Habitat Agenda task manager system to facilitate coordinated implementation of the Habitat Agenda by the United Nations system, and to streamline reporting to the Commission on Human Settlements and to the Council, in accordance with the framework presented in the present agreed conclusions.

“13. The Council requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 54/208, to appoint a full-time Executive Director for the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements and to fill vacancies for high-level positions in the Centre in order to strengthen its capacity, in particular in the preparatory process for the special session.

“14. The Council requests the regional commissions to facilitate the holding of regional meetings in preparation for the special session.⁵

“15. The Council requests the Secretary-General to call on member States to make voluntary financial contributions to the Secretariat to assist developing countries, particularly the least developed countries, to participate fully in the special session and its preparatory process.⁶

“16. The Council calls upon the international community, in particular developed countries, to continue providing the necessary technical and financial support for the elaboration by developing countries of their national reports on the implementation of the Habitat Agenda.”

Agreed conclusions 2000/2

7. At the 43rd meeting, on 27 July, the representative of Austria made a statement in which he introduced, on behalf of the Vice-President of the Council, Gerhard Pfanzelter (Austria), the draft agreed conclusions on the assessment of the progress made within the United Nations system, through the conference reviews, in the promotion of an integrated and coordinated implementation of and follow-up to major United Nations conferences and summits in the economic, social and related fields (E/2000/L.10).

8. At the same meeting, the Council adopted the draft agreed conclusions. The text read as follows:

“Agreed conclusions 2000/2

“1. The major United Nations conferences and summits of the 1990s have contributed towards the development of an integrated framework and a global partnership for development.⁷ Their recent five-year reviews and appraisals have been the occasion to reaffirm the goals and objectives agreed at the major United Nations conferences and summits and have identified obstacles and constraints encountered, actions and initiatives to overcome them and important measures for the further implementation of their programmes of action as well as new challenges and emerging issues.

“2. Governments have the primary responsibility for implementing conference outcomes. Sustainable development strategies are important mechanisms for bringing together priorities in the social, economic and environmental areas and thus for pursuing an integrated approach towards development. Governments, in developing these strategies, must ensure that they contain mutually supportive measures to promote economic growth, social development and environmental protection.

“3. International cooperation is crucial for the implementation of conference outcomes. The international community should meet the commitments made at the major United Nations conferences and summits of the 1990s and at their reviews.

“4. The Economic and Social Council reaffirms its commitment to promote a coordinated and integrated follow-up to and implementation of these major United Nations conferences and summits, including their five-year reviews, building on the guidance contained in its agreed conclusions 1995/1 and its subsequent resolutions on the coordinated and integrated follow-up to conferences.

“5. The Council, with support of its functional commissions, will continue to promote a better coordination among the functional commissions. The Council reiterates its commitment to support the General Assembly by making recommendations to it on policies for an effective, efficient and coordinated follow-up to and implementation of the major United Nations conferences and summits.⁸

“6. The Council notes the progress made by the United Nations system to support an integrated and coordinated follow-up to major United Nations conferences and summits, and encourages the system to further strengthen its efforts in this regard.

“7. The Council is committed to ensuring that the upcoming reviews of major United Nations conferences and summits are prepared in a well coordinated and effective manner and lead to substantial progress in the implementation of the goals of the conferences, building on the lessons learned during the implementation and taking into account the outcome of earlier reviews. There is also a need to ensure that not too many processes should be held over the same time period.

“8. The Council is of the view that a number of options, inter alia, those listed in paragraph 33 of the report of the Secretary-General,⁹ could be considered for ensuring an effective and comprehensive review at the intergovernmental level of major United Nations conferences and summits. The Council invites its relevant functional commissions¹⁰ to consider these and other possible options for enhancing the reviews of the major United Nations conferences and summits and to inform the Council for its consideration at its substantive session in 2001 of the outcome of their discussion. Particular attention should be given to the periodicity of conference reviews. In this context, the Council requests the Secretary-General to prepare a comprehensive report on the different options, including a compilation of the views expressed by these functional commissions.

“9. In reviewing these options, the functional commissions should also consider ways and means of ensuring that they have the capacity to conduct their follow-up of conference implementation. The Council reiterates that the relevant functional commissions and other relevant intergovernmental bodies should focus on the issues relating to the conference for which they are responsible, and obtain inputs from relevant bodies on related issues.¹¹

“10. The Council will pursue its role in addressing cross-cutting themes common to major United Nations conferences and summits. Furthermore, the Council will continue to promote an integrated and coordinated conference follow-up. In particular, it will follow up progress towards quantified goals and targets agreed at the conferences. The Council will draw the attention of the General Assembly to obstacles and constraints as well as to new challenges identified by the reviews that affect progress towards conference goals.

“11. The functional commissions and other intergovernmental bodies should, at an early stage, identify the possible agenda and scope of the review of the conference for which they have primary responsibility. In general, the reviews should ascertain lessons learned from the implementation of conference outcomes; constraints encountered and ways to overcome the constraints; and the impact of new developments and challenges. The outcome documents should be action-oriented and as concise as possible. To further foster the exchange of national and regional experiences in the functional commissions, donors are encouraged to provide financial resources to support participation of additional experts from developing countries.

“12. Regional and national preparations are critical elements of conference reviews. The regional commissions should be increasingly involved in the reviews. They should provide timely inputs for in-depth consideration by the functional commissions and the Council. Member States are encouraged to prepare national reports on the implementation of conference outcomes, which in turn the United Nations system organizations and bodies should use more extensively in future conference reviews. The Council reiterates the importance of relevant, accurate and timely statistics and indicators for evaluating the implementation of outcomes of the major United Nations conferences and summits at all levels. In this context, indicators should be developed with the full participation of all countries and approved by the relevant intergovernmental bodies. The United Nations system and other donors need to work together closely to mobilize the required resources to support the building of national statistical capacity in developing countries.

“13. United Nations system organizations are encouraged to further deepen their efforts to avoid duplicative requests for national reports and to share with one another information obtained through national reports thereby limiting information requested from Governments. The Council reiterates its request that the relevant secretariats prepare, in a collaborative manner, harmonized and simplified formats which could be used by Governments in preparing information on a single subject or cluster of subjects.

“14. In preparing the reviews, the functional and regional commissions and organizations of the United Nations system are invited to organize technical meetings.

“15. Each relevant intergovernmental body is encouraged to ensure that all other relevant bodies of the United Nations system, including the functional commissions, the regional commissions, the United Nations funds and programmes, the specialized agencies and the international financial institutions, are engaged at an early stage of the review process in order to ensure effective and comprehensive reviews of the major United Nations conferences and summits.

“16. The specialized agencies and organizations that have mandates in the area addressed by the major United Nations conferences and summits are invited to assure that their governing bodies are extensively involved in the review processes.

“17. The Council notes the work conducted in the Administrative Committee on Coordination on how the United Nations system can best respond to the challenges of globalization and work towards all conference goals. It invites the Committee and its subsidiary bodies to bring to the attention of the Council, on a regular and timely basis, coordination issues and common challenges related to conference follow-up.

“18. The Administrative Committee on Coordination and its subsidiary bodies should continue their work aimed at broadening the task manager approach in promoting integrated and coordinated follow-up to major United Nations conferences and summits, including through better use of the task managers for reporting on cross-cutting conference themes to the Council's functional commissions during their review processes.¹² The Committee is invited to inform the Council for its consideration of further developments and progress in this area.

“19. The involvement and participation of relevant actors of civil society in each conference review is of particular importance. The Council requests each preparatory body to examine ways and means to improve their participation in the review process.

“20. The Council encourages further progress to integrate conference outcome implementation into country assistance programmes. The Council reaffirms that the resident coordinator system has an important role to play in assisting Governments and enhancing United Nations system coordination, including through the establishment of thematic groups on cross-cutting conference themes and the full utilization of collaborative programming frameworks, particularly the common country assessments and the United Nations Development Assistance Framework, to support, at the request of Governments, the development of national strategies and action plans for integrated and coordinated conference follow-up. National reports on conference follow-up, where available, should be used in determining programmes in countries.

“21. The Council underscores the importance of building national capacities for implementing conference outcomes, and reiterates that, upon the request of Governments, national capacity-building should be an explicit objective of programmes and projects supported by the United Nations system.

“22. The Council encourages the building of partnerships and networks among national Governments, international organizations, civil society and private sector organizations in pursuit of conference goals.

“23. The Council calls on all Governments to undertake measures, at the national and international levels, to promote the effective mobilization of resources for implementing major United Nations conference and summit goals. In this regard, the Council urges donor countries to strive to fulfil the internationally agreed target of 0.7 per cent of their gross national product for overall official development assistance as soon as possible.”
